Our study also found a significant association between exposure to the most-cited source of news about HPV vaccine, the internet, and HPV vaccination coverage. Findings from this study add to the evidence that media coverage can influence HPV vaccination levels. Findings suggest that more attention should be given to HPV vaccination media coverage in Taiwan. Media has become an important source of information on different aspects of health-related topics, and previous studies have demonstrated that media coverage of the HPV vaccine, both television and the internet, can influence knowledge and perceptions of the vaccine \[[@B12],[@B35]-[@B38]\]. Further, several studies have indicated that media coverage is a strong motivating factor for parents to vaccinate their children against HPV \[[@B34],[@B35],[@B37],[@B39]-[@B41]\]. For instance, among social media users in North America, almost all (98%) of the respondents reported that they would seek information about the HPV vaccine through the internet, with 67% indicating that they would seek information from social media \[[@B37]\]. Healthcare professionals also have been found to play an important role in promoting HPV vaccination to parents \[[@B41]\]. Future public health efforts in Taiwan should be targeted at promoting HPV vaccination through the mass media, including television, radio, and the internet. This study also found that school-related factors were associated with HPV vaccination coverage. School-based immunization programs have been shown to be more effective than
