A differentiated pattern of defence mechanisms was found in women with chronic depression, including: (1) an adjustment and defend-mechanism; (2) 'Reverse Defense' and (3) an over-compensation mechanism. A combination of the above may offer a more specific explanation for the pathophysiology of chronic depression. The over-compensation mechanism is mainly associated with a 'loss of power' and may be explained by the general breakdown of the emotional and energy systems in the body. The 'Reverse Defense' appears to be due to a hyper-arousal reaction to situations when the patient is under real or perceived stress. This 'Reverse Defense' may induce a state of shock and a withdrawal from the situation. This may occur when the patient cannot cope with the demand from the environment. No clear relationship was found between the defence mechanisms and the clinical severity of depression is discussed.
