- The good: There are dozens of improvements under the hood. In my exhaustive research, I confirmed that Adobe updated its algorithm for noise reduction and found this: The output noise reduction results are extremely processor friendly. You can process any size image on any type of computer. There is a minimum of 1.8 GB of RAM required to process files. You can process all the way down to a very small file size of 50 MB. This is exciting and encouraging for people like myself, who have to deal with very large files of, for example, raw photos taken with their new fancy camera. You may be dealing with smaller file sizes now, but who knows how that will change in the future. Pros
- Dust Detection: I can tell you that this is a real game changer for the program. We have all worked with the command panel to manually remove dust particles from our image files. Remember that tiny little white spec that you can clearly see in the bottom-left corner? Well, this is the feature that makes dust removal an absolute breeze. You'll have to experiment with that, but I invite you to use it. It's an excellent feature. If you run out of RAM, the program will fine you out. You will know you are out of RAM because Photoshop will clear some of the icons on the bottom panel that shows you how much RAM you have. You'll be notified if the program needs additional RAM, and there is also a button to quickly clear the RAM immediately. The resolution of the page in the Adobe PSPrint Settings is no longer forced to be no more than 960 × 720.

You can change the tone of an image to make it lighter or brighter, but the tone settings only affect the lightest pixels in your image. If you adjust the shadows to lighten an image further, it may create washed out colors. For example, if you have dark red clothing, you can lighten the clothing to tint it green; if you adjust the shadows a little lighter and add some white to the image, you might have trouble finding a tonal value that works in the dark areas of the clothing. Once you've selected a color, you can click the color square to the right of the Eyedropper to see a preview of the selected color. You can choose a color from the Color Gallery, which contains more than 4,000 colors in various shades and tones, or type a color name into the Color Name field. What It Does: The Perspective tool is used to show or hide individual parts of the image to create a 3D effect. Viewing parts of the image at an angle gives a perspective effect. Using this tool, you can add a 3D look to your images to make the subject appear as if it's in a different location or plane than you see with the other tools. The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago.
