It appears that the $399 version of the app no longer supports drawing of RAW files through a mouse. In the new interface, they have replaced the pen with a laser pointer, which is of course, not compatible with the pen. You have to draw lines with the pen, which has very different results from making a scribble through the mouse. Of course, there is a "laser pointer" tool, but it's really slow. While having access to all of the adjustments in the top-left "rubber-band" view is nice, it still puts the control in the hands of professionals, i.e., they are using RAW files, so they won't be working at basic levels. You cannot compare Lightroom and Photoshop. They are very different things. For beginners and pros, how they work, is how they should be expected to work. Conveniently, the interface should seem intuitive with what you do naturally, but I have found that I often have undo after undo, even when I make simple changes. Sometimes, you do not realize that an accidentally saved change was made. I am not sure that this is unique to Lightroom, but I've always felt that it is inapplicable to a "professional" workflow. If you are not careful and are really confident in your work, you can step back from time to time to see if there is anything to be done. I am sure that Adobe will fix the interface, but they can't fix the fact that Lightroom workflow (and now Photoshop, too) is based on a destructive approach. As for the photo: Lovely, light colours, but not exactly RAW-style. And that image still doesn't fit to the screen perfectly. It's just that big! So, go with the fast workflow, then fire up the post-processing powers of Adobe. The downside is that you'll miss some of the fun you'll have with filters and adjustments. Or you can manage it the other way: reach for Photoshop's tools, that are way too heavy for a casual user. You'll love the text, but again, it will quickly outgrow even a 16:9 display. But don't worry: your patience and dedication will be rewarded!
