Elements provides users a great number of tools for solving simple and complex challenges. You can import photos into the program, align objects, change colors and light, rotate, remove objects from an image, convert images into vector and more. If you are having trouble discovering how to do something in Photoshop, try Elements instead. However, it is worth noting that Elements does have a share system built into the program. You can copy and paste images into the program to use for editing or you can use the share system, although the share system doesn't support moving or zooming images. Drag and drop One of the first things that you will learn with Photoshop Elements is that you can drag and drop images onto the workspace to create the assets and the design elements for a project. This can be on the stack or on the heap. Therefore it may be sent from the stack or the heap. Now I want to be able to use the class foo several times in the same function. And I want to pass the pointer to the function bazMethod to every instance of foo. Therefore there must be an instance of foo on the stack or the heap. Therefore I cannot place foo inside a std::map, because the map entry is deleted when the std::map entry is removed. But by calling a static method of a class, I get a pointer to the object. Now I want to be able to use the pointer to the static method in foo multiple times inside my function. The obvious solution would be to pass a reference to foo to the function. But I think there must be a better solution. I read about object layout and the vtable inside an instance of foo. But I have no idea how this relates to my problem. A: Do your foo instances need to actually point at heap objects? If not, you might consider: class foo { public: foo(){} void bar(); }; void foo::bar() { //... if(...) {
