Category:Spanish musiciansQ: Does "pray the teachers" mean "pray for the teachers"? In his prayer speech at the Peace Prize ceremony of the German President Joachim Gauck, a German theologian and canon, the Reverend in German Pastor Dr. Reinhard Müller-Hohage, had this to say: "The way the German education system is currently functioning is undignified, wicked and harmful. We say this with confidence and certainty, because we have in the past and today have experiences that are conclusive. In my view, the educators within this system are living in a state of profanation, because they are living and leading their work in the profession of God and his word. The words of Our Lord that stand at the center of everything we teach and do, take a back seat and are therefore not worthy of the dignity of the educators. As long as the teachers of the people are fulfilling their vocation in a fallen and profane manner, God does not forgive them and they will not be forgiven by people. The first teachers are known from the beginning of time, and they are only and exclusively God's teachers. As teachers of the people, they are called upon to feed the flock of God and to serve the church through their teachings and their own hearts. On this earth, the people have no other teachers, and therefore also no other savior. We as teachers are called to be his schoolteachers, and when people in good faith do their homework and arrive at the conclusion that we are also teachers, then we will receive grace as sinners do." Can I translate "the educators within this system are living in a state of profanation" as "pray the teachers"? It's the same with "and they will not be forgiven by people". Can I translate this into "pray for the teachers"? A: When priests address the priest, we don't say "Pray the priests", we say "Pray for the priests" or "Pray for the Church". The first two are more formal while the second one implies you have hope to be heard. This is a similar pattern to how we address each other, since we assume each other would
