The present invention is particularly well suited for use in conjunction with electrical test equipment for testing high frequency input/output devices such as telephone line test sets. Generally, such test sets include a current transformer for sensing and transmitting current levels within the telephone line. The current transformer is typically connected to a center tap of a "Y" shaped winding located in a coaxial cable. The "Y" shaped winding is typically connected to a power supply transformer that is connected to a telephone line power supply. The current transformer typically includes a cylindrical shell with a central opening extending from an upper portion of the shell to a lower portion of the shell. The opening is closed by a ferrite or other magnetic core that has an integral "Y" shaped winding mounted in the shell. The winding typically includes a plurality of windings that are wound in such a manner as to provide two primary winding loops connected together at a "Y" shaped junction. A secondary winding loop is also provided that is wound around the primary winding loops and that is connected to a sense resistor that is connected to an external test circuit that is connected to the telephone line. The windings are also wound in such a manner as to provide two secondary windings connected together at a "Y" shaped junction and connected to another sense resistor. In order to make an accurate measurement of current flowing through the telephone line, it is important that the current transformer be physically isolated from the telephone line so that variations in current in the telephone line from static charges or other effects are not picked up by the current transformer and transmitted to the test circuit. Thus, in order to achieve this physical isolation, a coaxial cable is
