Definitely watch out if you are within walking distance of any zoning — and get your city officials to help you if you need to fight a case. We've seen some smart politicians turn down one-size-fits-all zoning measures by minimizing the impact on an area that is next to a designated city growth area. It has nothing to do with race or ethnicity, but it is based on people who might live in that neighborhood." Hare said that data on growth rates can help officials, and that he recommends hiring a licensed real estate attorney as a precaution. Still, aside from checking an area's existing zoning, longtime urban planners say it's hard to predict what impact new businesses will have on surrounding properties. "It's all about pushing the envelope," said Robert Dunham, senior fellow at the Urban Institute. "You're going to upset people. You're going to appeal to people. You're going to need lawyers. Is this going to make a difference? It's hard to predict." Still, those changes can have consequences. Downtown has already seen the slow push of redevelopment that comes with increased density. Durham said that "there's already a whole new business district on the 'eastern edge' of downtown where there are over 30 new businesses, and four new hospitals and one new community college." But that has come at a price. Expensive apartments in those new buildings are out of reach for the average D.C. worker
