th: Trip Lee, the fugitive ninja strapped for time SAVANNAH — While the CIA is watching Alex Boczkowski carefully, they are not watching the street. And where have they turned their attention? To Trip Lee, the fugitive ninja, computer jockey and hacker. Lee is not strapped for time, but for money and sleep. And he is a legitimate target. Part of a highly trained army of anonymous online hackers known as the "Anon" collective, Lee stole $500,000 from a fortune management firm, issued ransom demands of more than $1 million to multinational corporations, allegedly encrypting data on devices that controlled their computer systems. All the while, his actions were tracked by the FBI and CIA, who now fear Lee is part of a sophisticated cyber attack operation with which he is terrorizing the world. Analysts believe he could be responsible for an attack on U.S. energy concerns, after electronic records and stock prices of a major oil company were hacked in recent days. The attack helped push oil to a recent 9-year high. In the last six months, Lee has conducted an online campaign of putatively harmless pranks that has drawn the attention of the FBI, claims Lee, but they haven't arrested him. "The people that you look at to be your enemy are actually just your friends," Lee said during a confidential chat with The Island Packet and the Southern Courier on a site he developed to describe

He declined to give his real name, but said he would speak with The Island Packet and Courier only as "anonymous." Assistant U.S. attorney Kim Lara Murrell says she has asked prosecutors in the Eastern District of New York to make sure that Lee is not allowed to gain access to law enforcement confidential files or systems on his ongoing case against the brokerage firm. "Of course I would have to see what was in those files and to what extent that could be a problem," Lee said. The FBI and CIA said Lee has recently used social media to call attention to himself and raise money. "He's been getting attention for a while," said FBI spokesman George Baldanzia. "He's been very active on Twitter and around making references to certain issues and looking
