Jul 22, 2014. Update to this version of the software. Developmental expression of platelet-activating factor receptors in the rat brain. We examined the localization of platelet-activating factor (PAF) receptors in rat brain by using in vitro autoradiography and immunohistochemistry with a monoclonal antibody against a synthetic peptide sequence of the human PAF receptor. PAF receptors were distributed in all brain regions of the adult rat. The most intense labeling was observed in the caudate-putamen and nucleus accumbens, followed by the cerebral cortex, amygdala, thalamus, hippocampus, midbrain, and hypothalamus. A notable difference between the autoradiographic and immunohistochemical results was observed in the brain of newborn rats. The distribution of [3H]PAF binding was similar to that of the monoclonal antibody, except for the choroid plexus and pineal gland, where [3H]PAF binding was lower. The present findings indicate that PAF receptors are widely distributed throughout the brain and that receptor expression may change during development. In New Hampshire you can live independently in the community, and receive services and support.
