Experimental studies demonstrated that intracoronary transplantation of bone marrow mononuclear cells with stem cell properties could improve left ventricular function in rats with infarction. The benefit seems to depend on the number of transplanted cells and their concentration in the infarcted myocardium. The purpose of our study was to compare the benefit in the left ventricular function in rats with acute myocardial infarction (AMI) of low and high concentrations of bone marrow mononuclear cells (BMMCs) injected into the coronary artery. In 30 rats with AMI, experiments were conducted with low and high concentrations of BMMCs (10(5) and 10(7) cells/rat, respectively) after 72 h of coronary occlusion. The two groups were compared by echocardiography and magnetocardiography at baseline and after 3, 6, and 12 weeks of observation. At baseline, the left ventricular ejection fraction in the group with high concentrations of BMMCs was lower than in the group with low concentrations of BMMCs (62 +/- 5 vs 51 +/- 3%, p = 0.05, respectively). With the high concentration of BMMCs, left ventricular ejection fraction deteriorated during the observation period compared with the low concentration of BMMCs (21 +/- 5 vs 38 +/- 6%, p = 0.004, respectively). Thus, a high concentration of BMMCs causes deterioration of left ventricular function in rats.
