The 53-bit encoder's output signal is decoded by the PLL circuit, which differs from the "auto" control circuit found on most encoders. With the 53-bit encoder, the encoder produces an output that is 100% out of phase with the CIP-8 input signal. This is a very unique technique. Most encoders have a similar configuration, with a 12-bit CIP-8 signal being decoded by an auto-control circuit in a clock-lock loop. In this unique configuration, we use a 14-bit CIP-8 signal for control of the output signal; the three remaining bits are used to change the length of the pulses emitted by the machine. Bits 1-6 control the output, bits 7 and 8 control the speed of the inverter/discharger signal. This results in a 100% out of phase signal at the DC level. I realize this takes up an unnecessary length, but I want to be sure you are clear what is being said and I truly want to explain this in my own words.
