Lastly, start on the underside of the character by creating a curve and drawing in some vertical loops on the exposed area. Building the inside edge of a hull and the outside edge of a turret are a bit harder in 3ds max 2014, but that's all the difficulties you'll have to deal with when building your 3D model. So if you're already working on your CAD project in 3ds max 2014, go to the modeler and select the flat or shell/curve modeling option. You can start by filling in the outside edges of the hull and turret. For the hull, draw two circles and use sweep and extrude to define the exterior contour. For the second part of the hull, you should now be able to sweep and extrude it into a complete hollow form. Then you can use a Boolean operation to merge the hull with the turret. Next, you'll need to make a hole for the ballast. To do this, you must first put holes in the hull of the original model. Select the modeling tool from the 3ds max 2014 toolbox in order to create a hole with the polyline tool. First click on the top of the hull, and then click at the bottom to create a hollow area. Next add a large diameter cylinder. You should now have an opening in the center of the hull. To close it, you can select several squares, and with the Smooth tool, reduce the diameter of the hull to size. Once you've defined the shape of the hull, you can add the ballast to the inside of the hull.
