The government's boss of waste collection has revealed how his company has been forced to slash the number of households its vans can visit in one go amid fears about the impact on local residents. Andy Corbett, chief executive of the Local Government Association, said it was the first step in a review of its contract with waste company Veolia after 4 full four of a year dispute with the company. He said the number of households Veolia could visit had been reduced to 400,000 - down from nearly 500,000 last year - but that was less than one-third of the number it visited in 2015/16 when an agreement with the union was in place. Speaking on the BBC's Today programme, Corbett added: "It just makes the whole thing more efficient. We've also cut the amount of time it takes us to get to people's houses, down from 14 to four minutes to four to two minutes. A spokesperson for Veolia said the company continues to work within its agreement with the LGU and was "confident of our ability to deliver sustainable service levels, despite the recent pay dispute". "Under the terms of our agreement we are required to reduce the amount of waste collected in communities by 25% during the course of a year. We continue to work towards this target, with previous collections falling between 82.5% and 84.5% year on year." They said Corbett admitted local authorities were forced to make cuts, but said: "I don't think there is a collection size that is acceptable to the government. We have got to find some financial way of engaging with the government on a sustainable basis. I think this will become more and more apparent over the next year." He said councils were forced to make cuts to their commercial waste collection contracts last year and local tender winners when they sought to expand their kerage rights. ©
