The outrage against Donald Trump's decision to impose tariffs on steel and aluminum is being directed at least as much at the Republican party as at the president's staff. Republicans are expressing fury over the self-defeating tariffs and threatening to counter with taxes on cars. But they have failed to come up with an alternative that would prevent auto tariffs in a global context. Most economic conservatives view tariffs as regressive taxes. People who can afford to pay for steel and aluminum are the sort of people who would be hit by a tariff. But these conservatives nonetheless sometimes come to the defense of tariff supporters. That's because tariffs were part of a policy package being pushed by Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher, both of whom they admire. But tariffs only work in their favor if there is a rival free trade policy that lowers or eliminates trade barriers. As President Reagan's policy advisers saw, tariffs only work against the rising tide of globalization. For example, Reagan's administration imposed a 20 percent tariff on Japanese auto imports in the 1980s when Japan was a rising economic power. But the tariff accelerated the rise of Japanese automobiles as their price in the U
