Photoshop, the computer program that helps you edit photos, is a type of image-manipulation program that is implemented into Adobe's creative suite. The biggest change with Lightroom was the addition of a "Lab" mode. This mode lets you easily change the white balance and temperature. Previously, you would have had to switch to the full white balance compensation to make the needed changes. These are a simple slider and a pop-up menu that includes warm, cool, etc. Adobe has listed two new features that I am most eagerly awaiting. One of these is "Sliding Tone Curves," which does produce quite a lot of noise reduction as radial filters do, but it creates tonality maps for better editing. This means one can take a picture and adjust the "levels" to get the colors they want. A "Tonal Compressor" will let you remove the color from the picture based on color, saturation and contrast. This is also a very nice feature unlike the default sliders, and some basic color corrections would go a long way toward improving images. Lightroom 5 brings a few new features and integrates others that have just been available for months now. The slideshow mode and the ability to delete the background is a welcome addition. In the past, a lot of photographs sat in the background or were left in a blank state. This is an issue I have always encountered in Lightroom and this new feature takes care of it. The full slider for temperature and white balance is also a welcome addition. Another big change is the ability to use the multi-manipulate mode. This lets you push and pull objects within a group with a single move. This may take some time to get used to, but as it is done in groups, once you understand the concept, it is a fantastic setup to work when needed.
