Adobe Photoshop is a great PC application that uses a lot of RAM. Although its memory footprint grows with every file, it does not use great amounts of physical memory, except for very large files (at which point Photoshop uses virtual memory instead). Generally memory usage should only become excessive when you start playing with layers, and you then need very solid RAM. Addition of layers to your document tends to degrade the performance of other layers (due to incompatibilities), so you need to be careful with this. Photoshop will use as much RAM as it needs to keep the layers you are working with "Paintable". Photoshop has all sorts of clever techniques to manage what it paints, including "Fast Stacking" which essentially wipes out layers that aren't being actively painted, and "Paint Suggest" which paints as many layers as you can, effectively performing a "live painting" of a photo. It will handle all these processes very rapidly, upgrading RAM if need be. Any layers you hide on a document that hasn't been updated often before saving the file, or that are viewed infrequently, will cause Photoshop to purge the RAM they used, and be reloaded the next time you work on that document. It is a huge accomplishment that Photoshop and those two other programs are bundled together in such a way that they all work like they should. When I'm in a hurry, I'll use the iPad Pro and Photoshop. As a full-fledged desktop program, I'll use the App on my desktop or notebook.
