A Wacom Cintiq Pro is one of the most powerful graphics tablets money can buy. If you have one (or a good friend who does), it's a must-have. [Geeky Gadgets] Wacom Bamboo Ink: The Wacom Bamboo Ink stylus pen lets you draw and write in the air while playing your favorite games. It senses your movements on the screen and provides intuitive feedback. Pocket Projector: The Pocket Projector is a tiny projector that plugs into a USB port. With its small size, it's easy to carry around, but you can also beam video from a laptop or mobile device right onto your wall. One caveat: When you bring one of these into a place like, say, your cubicle: you probably won't get the kind of stares from coworkers that you'd get from just plugging in your laptop. GoPro: Just because you're watching "Frozen" doesn't mean you can't shoot some footage of it for your YouTube channel. The GoPro attaches to a surface and lets you film 360-degree video. [Storage] Solid-state drives: Solid-state drives, or SSDs, are an improved storage medium. Their contents are never lost and they can be written to hundreds of times over. They can be plugged directly into your computer's motherboard. The WD Green is a popular, affordable model. Footballer to get $11 million from club for lost love Kim Kwang-woo 5 Min Read SEOUL (Reuters) - South Korean top-division football club Gwangju FC is paying $11.3 million in compensation to Han Il-ho, the highest-profile Korean soccer player caught in a scandal over alleged match-fixing, the club said on Thursday. Gwangju FC said it had agreed to pay the final price for the player who has reportedly left the club. Han, a midfielder and son of Hyundai Heavy Industries head Chang-ho Han, was sentenced to three years and nine months in prison earlier this year for match-fixing after he admitted to accepting $500,000 to fix a match between Daegu FC and Gwangju FC in 2009. The world's most expensive football scandal has already seen three-time world player of the year Ronaldo, 53, jailed for 11 years for involvement in a match-fixing scandal in Portugal. In South Korea, three former Gwangju FC players are serving time in prison after being convicted of match-fixing. The case has also raised questions about the credibility of Asian football's governing body, the Asian Football Confederation (AFC), which has been accused of failing to control the issue properly. The AFC has insisted that Han is the only convicted Korean player under its jurisdiction. Gwangju FC later disclosed that it had paid the amount and has also reached an agreement with Han, 30, for him to transfer to another club in the near future. "I appreciate our club's efforts and will work hard for the club to recover as quickly as possible," Han said. "I will continue to have faith in the football community and I believe we will rebuild our club as stronger and more solid after achieving this success." The deal raises fresh concerns about the quality of professional football in South Korea. It is also the latest incident in an increasingly murky world of gambling and match-fixing in South Korea, a major sports power whose players have dominated world football. It came weeks after South Korean police raided a branch of a South Korean soccer club and arrested at least seven people in connection with a match-fixing scandal in the early 2000s, the first case in Asia. He was a member of the national football team before playing for Gwangju
