History The Photoshop interface has remained much the same since Photoshop 1.0, released in 1987. Image editing was formerly done with Applesoft BASIC, Borland Graphic Basic, and Quickdraw. Many computer programs in the 1980s used to include a paint program that resembled the Paint shop Pro 4.0 (January 1990) interface we are all familiar with today. Because of the success of Photoshop, Apple added an image editing application to its LaserWriter software. An earlier version of a paint program called Apple Paint Shop Pro 2.0 (1980) featured an interface similar to Paint Shop Pro 4.0 (January 1990). It retained the simple tools found in the earlier program, but added the layers and layers mask functionality, which can be thought of as a form of masking. The development of the interface and its features was influenced by the 1987 MacPaint program from the Xerox Corporation. It was the first time that a Macintosh software development team came together as one team instead of dividing the work among many individual designers. Photoshop 1.0 — Photoshop 1.0 was released in 1989, not long before the Macintosh version of Adobe Pagemaker, an earlier Adobe product. Software versions before Photoshop 1.0 could not have the full power of Photoshop. Photoshop 1.0 was a year before the version for Windows, and most Macintosh computers that ran Photoshop could not run Windows. Although Photoshop 2.0 was released in 1990, the Windows version was released before the Macintosh version. Users of Macintosh computers could not run the Macintosh version until later. Photoshop 2.0 was the first time that Photoshop came bundled with a disk. A built-in disc burner allowed the copy-protected updates to be installed without having to go through a mail-in registration process. In 1992, Microsoft licensed the Macintosh interface from Photoshop developers Adobe as the basis for its own Paint package, which became known as Paintbrush. Photoshop 3.0

Photoshop 3.0 added many new features, including layers, channels, enhanced edit modes, blend modes, cloning, and an interface that provides for a more intuitive, user-friendly way to work with images. A new Editor window was added to allow users to edit a number of different layers at once and independently with the help of an adaptive size preview feature and real-time guidelines that track the edge of the canvas and change the size of the document to fit the picture. Bl

Neuman, B.S. (Update) Aug. 2, 2014 at 6 p.m. – The Occupy Movement’s website has been up and down this morning. My information is that they are cutting off access to the site. Their Twitter account is, similarly, not reporting any updates. I am unable to determine whether the occupation at the NRG plant has ended. I have been assured by various sources that this is not the case. (Original article published Aug. 1, 2014) There’s no word on the fate of the peaceful occupation on the NRG site in downtown Houston. But some time ago, they found themselves there when a Judge ruled that GEO Group Inc., the company that runs the federal immigrant detention center they had occupied, would have to “immediately vacate its corporate property.” Judge Brownlee issued the order during an emergency hearing on Monday, August 1st, and all the people who had been sleeping on the grounds of the facility were to be moved out. The judge specifically requested that the people find shelter elsewhere, explaining that they would not be permitted to remain overnight and be kept out of the air conditioning. The remaining occupiers asked the city for their hotel rooms and were denied. The city gave the occupiers a number of alternate lodging options for Tuesday night, but still the remaining occupiers rejected those suggestions and elected to sleep outside the NRG-Intermex plant in downtown Houston. The occupiers told KPRC in-depth coverage of their troubles that Houston Police had threatened them with arrest if they remained at the site, and they chose to disregard the threat. The occupiers had vowed to stay at the site throughout the night and
