The PostgreSQL journal is a possible candidate for monitoring PostgreSQL transactions. This blog post explains how to monitor the PostgreSQL journal using PostgreSQL11. You can compare the example in the real time to the results in this blog post and then decide what database or monitoring solution to use. There are multiple options how you can monitor the PostgreSQL's journal. The easiest way to start is to use an existing monitoring solution. If you don't have an existing solution, you can install PostgreSQL11 on an EC2 instance. (Shared EBS storage makes this easy). For this blog post, I also took the first step of my journey to find a monitoring solution: Install PostgreSQL11 and create a database to monitor. Create database and database user First, we need to create a database where we can store our journal values. In PostgreSQL11, we need to create a database named monitor_journals. 1 2
