Timeline of the Indo-Aryan migration out of the Indian subcontinent and in the world Some time between the second half of the 2nd millennium BCE and the 7th century CE, various tribes emigrated from the Indian subcontinent into the Middle East. These tribes brought with them Sanskrit, and along with it an entire civilisation that is no longer recognisable as being from India. These tribes, the original Aryan tribes, later divided into various sub-tribes with different dialects of Sanskrit as their common language. In their wake, in addition to their Sanskrit language, they left a legacy of many of their vernaculars, including: (a) the Dravidian languages, (b) the Iranian languages, (c) the Austroasiatic languages, (d) some of the Nilo-Saharan languages, (e) many of the Austronesian languages, (f) Afroasiatic languages (in particular Tigre), and (g) the Tibeto-Burman languages (in particular Burmese, Malay, and Thais). The Indus Valley civilization The third most important Indo-Aryan language is the Indus Valley script. Some scholars date it to as early as 2000 BC, while others claim that it was developed only around 1500–1700 BC. They believe it was a syllabic script used in rituals of ancient India. It is notable that the Indus Valley civilization itself is considered to have been an "Aryan" civilization. The Vedic period The second most important Indo-Aryan language is Sanskrit, the ancient form of the language of the Vedas. The Vedas were compiled over a period of approximately two thousand years from 1500 BC to 400 BC. In the Atharva Veda, the early form of the Vedas, Yajurveda and Rigveda are mentioned as having been composed in the eastern half of the subcontinent, specifically in the area surrounding the Indus River. The Aryan invasion theory According to the Aryan invasion theory, the Indo-Aryan migration was due to the invasion of the Aryan tribes of the Punjab by the Indo-European tribes. While most scholars accept the migration of Indo-European tribes into South Asia, a large number of scholars doubt the existence of the Aryan race. Mainland migration theory Mainland migration theory states that the Proto-Dravidian languages descended from
