How does the disease that causes Rocky Mountain spotted fever kill rats and mice? Everyone wants to know what happens when Rickettsial bacteria invade the bloodstream and settle in the liver. The authors dissect a mouse infected with R. rickettsii and see how the rickettsia represses host cell functions. (Hotchkiss et al., J. Exp. Med. 177, 1993.) R. rickettsii is a serious human bacterial infection, caused by the bacterium Rickettsia rickettsii, and is characterized by fever and rash. While the pathogenesis of Rickettsia rickettsii is characterized by the pathogen spread throughout endothelial cells of small blood vessels of the liver, spleen, lymph nodes, kidneys, and lungs, the molecular mechanisms in which the bacteria cause pathogenesis remain poorly understood. In this study, we investigated host molecular responses to this pathogen at the cellular level. The results showed that R. rickettsii induced the suppression of host genes and the shut down of host cellular functions in infected cells. The data indicated that the repression of host gene expression is due to alterations in host cell protein synthesis induced by the presence of the Rickettsia bacteria. We observed that R.

rickettsii repressed host gene expression by suppressing the initiation phase of host gene transcription via inhibition of transcription factor nuclear translocation. Our study showed that R. rickettsii could inhibit host gene expression by repressing host transcription factor nuclear translocation. These data increase our understanding of the basic pathogenesis mechanisms of R. rickettsii infection. Tin acts as a potent radioprotective agent against radiation-induced structural chromosomal aberrations in cultured human peripheral lymphocytes. The radioprotective efficacy of tin was evaluated in vitro with cultured human peripheral lymphocytes. Four different concentrations of tin (0.1, 1, 5 and 10 mg/ml) were incubated with human lymphocytes up to 24 h prior to the irradiation. Results demonstrated that the protective effects were manifested throughout the cell cycle. However, the best radiation protection was obtained with the lowest concentration (0.1 mg/ml) of tin. Treatment with 0.1 mg/ml tin (irradiated or not irradiated) did not result in any significant increase of chromosomal aberrations, though there was a slight decrease in the number of metaphase cells. The number of aberrant cells was decreased at all post-irradiation times when the
