In many applications, data is transmitted through a data stream in synchronism with a clock signal. Examples of such data streams include incoming and outgoing telephone channels, synchronous data streams (e.g., an Ethernet or RapidIO data stream), and data streams transmitted using a serial or asynchronous data protocol (e.g., a Universal Asynchronous Receiver/Transmitter or UART data stream). For any such data stream, the clock signal and data signal must be synchronized in order to recover an accurate representation of the data from the data stream. A variety of techniques are employed to synchronize data transmitted through a data stream. For example, in U.S. Pat. No. 5,940,253 to Ueki, a clock signal is embedded within data bits in a data stream and reference clock edges are transmitted in a separate channel to establish clock reference data. The embedded clock signal and the data stream are sampled and an edge of the clock is detected by aligning edges of the data and the clock in time and space. However, in some applications, such a technique does not provide sufficient accuracy. In U.S. Pat. No. 6,006,285 to Srinivasan et al., the clock signal is transmitted within the data stream, and it is adjusted in accordance with a delta-sigma phase comparator to match the data stream clock signal. In U.S. Pat. No. 6,178,856 to Tanaka et al., the clock signal is transmitted via a separate data channel at a different data rate. The clock signal is compared to a clock signal having a known jitter to determine a time difference, and based on the difference between the determined time difference and a predetermined time difference, a delay is applied to the
