Field of the Invention This invention relates to thermite compositions and more particularly to thermite compositions which are relatively insensitive to the presence of oxygen and maintain a high reaction rate for a significant period of time. 2. Description of the Prior Art Thermite is a well known chemical reaction consisting essentially of the combination of metal, usually iron, and a metal oxide at an elevated temperature. The metal reacts with the metal oxide in the thermite reaction to produce a flammable gas. This reaction occurs at temperatures from about 1500.degree. to about 3000.degree. F. At the lower temperatures one finds that iron reacts first with the metal oxide to form iron oxide. The thermite reaction then completes itself at the higher temperatures. In application of the thermite reaction, there are two basic uses. One is to provide a heat source for welding rod, smelting or heat treating operations. Another is to provide a thermite composition which, upon ignition or application of a suitable ignition energy, will react and produce a fire or explosion. There have been many attempts to produce a thermite which will react and produce an explosion at

To determine whether carrageenan-induced synovitis in stifle joints of dogs is a useful model for the study of fibroblast-derived cytokines and to examine the effects of partial meniscectomy on the development of synovitis in the setting of the normal perioperative period. Synovitis was induced by injecting 2% carrageenan into the stifle joints of six dogs. Six dogs undergoing right stifle meniscectomy received an injection of 2% carrageenan into one stifle joint immediately before and after surgery. Control joints (not injected with carrageenan) were examined by histopathology at 24 and 48 hours after surgery. Serum was collected immediately before and 24 hours after
