"i would think you would want to find out," trump said. "because i think you'd want to find out if there was something wrong." ad ad this remark, which was made weeks before trump clinched the republican nomination, is now being used by democrats to attack the nominee as being potentially compromised by russia. the problem is that by the time this question was asked, trump's team had already spent months compiling a list of russian ties. the broad brush of "we don't know what they are" was a reasonable response. and trump is not the only world leader to have questioned the practice. when asked about the allegations in 2016, vladimir putin said: "in any case, if there is such a recording, why hasn't it been released?" in february, 2016, then-candidate trump said: "i've never heard of it and i don't believe in listening to them. but if somebody said something, it would have to be pretty close to me to do that." ad now, we don't know whether trump's comments were genuine. but we do know that the trump campaign, his surrogates and his allies have been very forthcoming with stories about russia. ad in january of 2016, trump's team asked the republican national committee to publicly deny that russian hackers had access to the party's computers, according to the post. "we wanted to make sure that if something leaked, it would be attributed to somebody other than the rnc," the rnc's chief of staff told the post.
