It works with basic image form and also with .Pre-evaluation of four generic, unmodified drugs in 5 in-vitro models. To determine if drugs, which are already unmodified and approved for marketing in the European Union are correctly classified as generic or copy products. Comparative bioanalytical method validation. Four pharmaceutically active components of generic pharmaceutical products were subjected to a set of stringent and reliable in vitro bioanalytical assays for generic and copy products. Cardiac glycosides, hydroxyfolic acid, caffeine and fluoxetine were used as model compounds. Furthermore, the effect of the generic substitution of allopurinol on the time-dependent sorption of the model compound was examined. The data obtained were compared with those of the Pharmacopoea and similar products such as therapeutic drug monitoring in vivo assays. The plasma protein binding was determined with an ultrafiltration assay and the binding to hydrophobic membrane surfaces using a static adsorption assay. The extraction from human serum was studied with LC-MS/MS and the fat-solubility was determined in fresh human serum at 37°C. The measured relative standard deviations were similar to those of the Pharmacopoea and similar products with the exception of fluoxetine and hydroxymethyluracil, which were not stable in the absence of antioxidants, as seen with LC-MS/MS and the static adsorption assay, respectively. Regardless of their origin, all four analytes are unsuitable for the use of generic products because of the quality control requirements listed in the Pharmacopoea.
