It is quite often the case that not all the functions in a given application are accessible or easy to use for non-developers. Photoshop is no exception. For example, the print dialog for creating a new document is static, with Width, Height, Margins, and Orientation being hard-coded and never dynamic. When printing, the dialog will always print from bottom to top left-to-right. In a similar situation, Photoshop layers can be named and arranged, but their visibility can only be toggled off or on, turned off or on, and hidden or unhidden. A single layer can not be made invisible or visible, but many layers can. Here, a setting of curve or a setting of white balance can help create images in the best way possible. Photoshop does not make this information available in the same panel as where you would access this information in other applications. Another example of where this lack of standardization complicates life is with the use of action, which is a step-by-step workflow created in Adobe Lightroom to automate the process of setting a wide variety of settings. Action namespaces can be saved and shared. The idea behind this is to enable users with similar needs to communicate with one another directly. Lightroom editors have previously had to constantly check for updates to action sets and make sure they are up to date. Now, with Lightroom 5's new integration with Photoshop, actions can be renamed and customized directly. Lightroom editors will also now get a new set of Settings tabs, which include the presets, actions, and other tools they added to the library, a customized settings file, and all of the customizations made to those files. Since these are all available directly through the desktop app from the Edit menu, they are immediately accessible. Until now, there has been no way to access all of these settings unless Lightroom was open.

Now that you're all caught up with Lightroom, I'm not waiting any more. To lose my caution and give you another reason to download Lightroom, any of you with photographers are probably aware of the challenges and difficulties involved when trying to compare and convert RAW images from various cameras. To make your workflow just a little bit easier and more streamlined, Lightroom CC 2018 contains a new feature that allows you to convert and compare your photos from a single camera back to the original camera file. Type up to four files into the "Change Camera" window, and press a button to instantly compare the images by the EXIF data. After a few seconds, you'll get an alert of images "matching" against the original files. Your edited files are on the right, and the original files are on the left in the window. You can press the green checkmark to save the edited files. Doing so creates a backup copy of the original file that was selected so you're safe. Adobe began with the idea that the crowning achievement would be emotions, experiences and time that go into creating a masterpiece and it is just such a developing AI application. Adobe's in-house AI team built on its knowledge center to build a really wide learning tool. It helped develop a set of programs — 16 in total — fit to brush strokes, layers, compositions, clothing, and moods. All that's left is for you to try and capture those scenes. It's exciting for us to be having this conversation here, kind of a way to share the excitement of the technology. New features will be released as part of a major update to Air, Photoshop CC and Photoshop Web Standards, scheduled for the second half of 2019. The updates are designed to make the Photoshop desktop app truly desktop-first for the growing number of people editing designs across many different devices – from phones and tablets, through desktops and TVs. Users can expect a seamless experience for collaborative editing without leaving the desktop, and the app will work the same way whether they're working on a computer, tablet or even a TV. Commercial artists, photographers, graphic designers and illustrators, and more will get the opportunity to share and edit work faster and with greater efficiency across many devices. A new Share for Review feature in Photoshop CC, added in 2019 with the new update, enables users to share designs for review while they work directly in the app. From there, users can see modifications in real-time without leaving Photoshop. The update also Photoshop customers in the Adobe Creative Cloud, including Premiere Pro, After Effects, and other applications within the Adobe Creative Cloud suite, can access Photoshop for the first time on mobile and desktop. With a single click, users can give files a new look, adjust colors and contrast, clean up edges and then share their edits on social channels.
