A: You can see a lot of crack attempts, since they are trying to install a backdoor for hidden capabilities and codes. And of course they fail as if the operating system was protected. But we need a working demo of the stolen software for the hack. So I propose you to install the software on a virtual machine with VirtualBox. There's nothing to be afraid of. The installer and the crack attempt will be visible in a VirtualBox window. If you find it troublesome to do this you can also try to flash the BIOS of the system. Google is your friend for that: BIOS flashing. In the future be careful with sending people your USB Key or your computer to do this. Also don't give them administrator privileges on the system. Vitality Ranches, a company based in New Zealand, seems to have stolen LinkedIn's branding. LinkedIn was founded in 2002. Vitality started up in November. If you have LinkedIn, it's entirely possible that it was sent to you by mistake. Because LinkedIn was last made private in April of 2009, no new accounts have been created for a long while. In fact, a lot of LinkedIn's users haven't been looking at their profiles in a while. And, using the company's email system, your invitations to join a LinkedIn group, its alumni network, or just connect with people based on mutual connections, may be arriving for old accounts whose email is no longer linked to the current account. Related Articles Well, I'm headed out to the Bard's Pub in downtown Bardstown the second week in June where they are having their annual "Kentucky Bourbon Auction." I've been to the Bard's numerous times, a low of HGVs and lorries moving house, a sound which has now gone forever. Instead I get to listen to the sound of the sea crashing against the shore and the chatter of seagulls. It's a good change from building
