One of the most important settings to understand is the photo ISO. A low ISO is good when you are taking photos in low-light situations. It will reduce the number of photos you need to take so you will not have to overexpose them to get enough light. In addition, it will ensure that your photos don't become too dark when you share them online. However, if you are using the camera in a very bright setting, you should consider using a higher ISO to get the best possible photos. Other places where you'll see HDR workflow becoming more accepted, don't get me wrong—especially Marketing, Publishing, and Technical Art are other big places where HDR is happening—but when you look at your fellow designers, I guarantee you'll see a lot of them wearing glasses when it comes to their tool of choice for image editing. Since a good amount of my time is spent working with Photoshop, and I constantly have to think about how to dig out of new creative problems. I'm currently on the hunt for a more useful utility that can check for some common Photoshop problems and fix them for me. I'm also on the hunt for an equally intuitive tool that is more advanced in Photoshop so I can try new features and learn more about it. I don't want to learn how to use the same tools I'm familiar with to do new things I've never done before. I'm all about customization in any endeavor so I found something I love: I can customize my brush tool! Every software program has a brush tool, but YouTube videos and Photoshop blogs show up various options for it. While Photoshop doesn't make it that easy for you to customize it, the shortcuts are similar to most programs. My tip is this: You can change the size and the amount of water added every time you paint with it. The command that I'm going to walk you through is the M key and then you can control how much water to put into it by using the F key. With Quick Selection tool, you can select the areas to paint. I have this mode turned on. e3d0a04c9c
