Furthermore, the circuit court found that the applicant's testimony was not credible; it found that he "was testifying in a harassing manner in the belief that he could fool the Court," and stated that a "jury would not believe that the Court didn't know what was going on in its courtroom." We cannot say that the credibility determination of the circuit court in this instance was clearly erroneous. Finally, as to the second prong of the Strickland standard, the applicant has not shown that the outcome of his trial was adversely affected by counsel's failure to investigate the aforementioned claims. It is certainly not the case that the outcome of the applicant's trial would have been different had these claims been investigated by counsel. Thus, the applicant has failed to satisfy the second prong of the Strickland test. Based on the foregoing, we conclude that the applicant has failed to satisfy the test set out in Strickland v. Washington for determining the validity of the applicant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeals dismissing this application is therefore affirmed.
