The master, appearing to be a tall, pale man with a mustache and black slicked back hair, had a scar that started at his mouth and ran diagonally down his chin, reaching past his cleft, and then continued all the way down his neck. She stopped, pouted, and put her hands in her pockets as if to seek an answer within. She realized she had been slightly hot-tempered, and she had very little idea of how to become calm again, what to say, how to move forward. With a quick move she had taken the apple from her pocket, eaten the piece, and he had let her eat the rest of the apple. She had never been patient at a party before, but now that she had eaten the apple she was very happy and began to talk to other people. At that time he knew that he would have to get on with life as it stood, but he was not yet ready to do this. He was so very tired of being nobody, of being unattractive and unloved, and he knew that it was not the people in his life who were to blame for this but himself. All his life he had believed that he was nobody and that nobody cared about him, but now he felt that there was truth in the old Latin saying, Fata sunt qui ceu unus sint, that there are people who appear to be
