We've previously discussed how you can use web sockets to capture and react to performance problems on the server. With the help of the netty async worker, you can combine web socket handling and long running tasks in Java, without having to depend on an additional library. Servlets are the preferred way of building web applications, but they've become increasingly slower as the web has evolved. Servlet programming requires a lot of boilerplate code and a lot of code to be run in the Servlet Container, before your application even starts executing. This code includes initializing a connection to a database, and building an in memory list of all items that are going to be processed later. The web socket pattern will allow us to avoid this extra overhead, and we can use the netty async worker to allow us to keep processing with minimal interruption. Let's start with a simplified overview of how a servlet normally works. Start up Tomcat and hit a URL, which will be routed to a server. The server will register the request with a user session, and start allocating threads for the session. For each request, there are two threads that are always allocated: a connection pool thread to acquire a connection from the connection pool, and a thread to process the HTTP request. When a session is allocated to a user, a copy of the session-state is serialized (I'll explain what this means a little further down) and stored in memory for the lifetime of the session. In the code from an example of a servlet, the request is handled as follows: Assuming that this example is being processed by a connection pool that uses an object based connection pool, the pool-size is configured. Once a session is allocated to a user, a request is passed off to the servlet handler which will do whatever processing it needs to do, allocating a thread for the servlet to handle. The thread will then process the request until it's completed, and will then kill off the thread. Finally, when the thread has finished processing the request, it will notify the connection pool, and it will be returned to the connection pool. When this service is stateless, it's a fairly simple example of how a servlet works. What happens if you want to offer your users a richer experience? How would you model a user session? In a web application, there are a few more variables that a user would expect to be in a
