Q: Why does "function f(foo);" get skipped when it was defined before the other function? I have some code: function g() { function h() {} function f() {} return g; } function g() { function f() {} function h() {} return g; } So f is called by the script and g is not. But if i change the order of the functions, so the f is called before g (the first version), the f is always called, even if i called g. I don't understand why. A: In JavaScript, functions are reference to objects, so the function called is the reference to the object. It's not about the order of the function declaration. The function is called only if it's necessary. Lithium dependence of membrane potential in brain cells of the rat. Intracellular microelectrodes were used to study the membrane potential in small brain cells in slices of rat cerebellum. After reduction of extracellular Ca⁺⁺, the cells depolarized and received an inward current. Infusion of 10 mmol/L Li⁺ caused membrane depolarization from -77 to -47 mV and inhibition of the inward current. Similar effects were seen in the presence of 5 mmol/L Na⁺ and, in addition, cell hyperpolarization. This could be due to changes in K⁺ and Cl⁻ channels.
