Whether or not you want to use Lightroom 5 is obviously based on personal taste and the features provided by the latest version. For those of you who are interested in the new version, I hope to help you understand the features you will miss while introducing you to some you will likely enjoy. The Lightroom interface is extremely well-organized. The original five tabs in the top left are organization, adjustments, development, history, and collections. The default view is organized into folders, where you can store your images into a single folder, multiple categories in the same folder, or in many sub-folders of any type. You can also use Smart Collections to categorize and group your images, which means that organizing your images becomes a lot easier. Each tab has a unique button that can be toggled at the top of the windows. For example, if you have many images to edit, you can quickly toggle the adjustment and organization tabs on and off. For those images that you have only finished processing, you can toggle off the adjustment tab. This is a great feature. The adjustments tab that most new users are likely to see has a filter button on it that allows you to toggle on blend-mode (Lighten, Darken, Color Burn, Color Dodge, Hard Light, Soft Light, Pin Light, Linear Light, Pin Spot, Linear Spot), opacity-mask (Cut Out, Modify, and Grain), desaturation, hue (color) or saturation, cross-process color, cross-process black and white, and a set of custom filters such as desaturate and cross-process, which is similar to the color effects in Camera RAW 10.2.

You may often want to print something or create a cropped or scaled-down version of your photo. And that's where manipulating your layers becomes handy: you can combine multiple images in a single layer and interact with drawings and text on them. And if your desktop icon is too small to see, you can zoom it to see fine details. You can quickly choose the bits of a work that you want to emphasize and apply specific filters and effects on them, like the one we've used in this video. Multiple Selection is the tool that will save your time. If you're working with at least one other person on a project you will have a common understanding of what looks good and which element should be more heavily emphasized. It's a way of making sure everyone on your project gets the same face when viewing the project in a large scale. There are other design tools that you may want to consider working with on your projects such as the Shape Tool, which allows you to create custom shapes from scratch, or the Magic Wand tool, that lets you precisely isolate everything in a photo. The Face Lettering tool is a way to create custom, quick and modern lettering for your projects with zero coding skills. Each font is a collection of editable vector shapes, so you can easily change the size, style and composition of letter characters. 933d7f57e6
