addition to the patch release that's scheduled for August 8. EA announced a handful of downloadable content plans earlier this year, including Kill Confirmed -- a timed only PvE mode that will reward players for eliminating enemies -- and a four-on-four arcade football mode. The company said those downloads would be available on launch day of the game, but none of them have started showing up on gamers' download servers. As reported earlier this week, EA's new Madden 09 DLC plans appeared on an EU store page, but it's no longer there. EA's reasons for waiting on downloadable content may be more complicated than you think. Heath mentioned that some of EA's plans for downloadable content may be more complicated than, "Hey, we're going to release a new day one patch." Instead, the company appears to be taking extra caution to prevent players from downloading content that may eat into its plans to release free cash-ins and token events for EA's retail release. It's a noble plan, but one that just wouldn't work if every patch included additional content. That's a bit of a shame, especially since, "Madden 09" is one of the prettiest and most satisfying sports games around. Click past the break to check out a few screenshots of the game in action and, hopefully, see a bit of EA's planned for the game's DLC this fall. Jessie Wade is an associate editor for IGN
