We describe here a novel approach for the construction of recombinant fusion proteins in a bacterial expression vector that facilitates the production of protein immunogens. This approach is based on the introduction of a copy of the cloned gene into a constitutively active plasmid via homologous recombination. Sequences necessary for the in-frame ligation with the cloned gene's own 5' sequences are encoded by the targeting vector. The presence of a small number of extra nucleotides (2 bp) after the desired gene allows the recombination to occur between the recombination sites and the target gene. In order to produce a subunit vaccine protein, the targeting vector is integrated into the chromosome of a recombinant E. coli clone. The insertion of the genetic material is confirmed by the identification of antibiotic markers, which can be eliminated by homologous recombination. The vector constructs used are designed to facilitate the expression of covalently linked glycoprotein subunits by directing them to the periplasmic space of the bacteria. Subsequently, they are processed via proteolytic enzymes and chemically linked to carrier proteins. The feasibility of this approach was demonstrated in the construction of a recombinant fusion protein of tetanus toxin. The recombinant protein could be highly purified and induce protection in mice. Since it can be produced in large quantities, this approach is feasible for the production of vaccine antigens.Q: Как изменить редактор.mov на Blender? Как изменить редактор.mov на Blender? Obese patients with mandibular hypoplasia and anterior open bite have shown an increased incidence of development of obstructive sleep apnea syndrome (OSAS) and post-surgical velopharyngeal insufficiency. We hypothesized that OSAS, and the specific metabolic factors associated with OSAS, may also be associated with an increased incidence of velopharyngeal insufficiency in patients with hypoplastic mandibles after pharyngeal flap and epiglottic flap reconstruction. Retrospective review of patients undergoing a one- or two-stage pharyngeal flap or epiglottic flap reconstruction performed by a single surgeon between 1992 and 2014. An apnea-hypopnea index (AHI)>5 events/h was an inclusion criterion. Eighty-one patients were evaluated. The mean follow-up was 3.4 years. Sixty-four patients were male (80%). Median age at the time of reconstruction was 4 years. Eighty-five percent of patients underwent a two-stage reconstruction and 15% underwent a one-stage reconstruction. The incidence of velopharyngeal insufficiency at minimum follow-up was 9% (7/81) and 9.8% (8/81) in patients with and without comorbid OSAS, respectively. The odds ratio for velopharyngeal insufficiency in patients with OSAS compared to
