The polyolefins themselves, or blends of one or more polyolefins and one or more polymeric additives, can have advantageous properties such as toughness and impact strength. Many such polyolefins have a relatively low melting point, making them difficult to process. In addition to their melting point, the processability of polyolefins can depend on a number of other properties. For example, polyolefins having a low melt index (i.e. low viscosity at 300° F.) can exhibit a relatively high melt viscosity at room temperature (i.e. low temperature relaxation), making it difficult to process these polyolefins at or below room temperature. As another example, polyolefins having a relatively low shear sensitivity can have low melt elasticity, which can decrease the possibility for processability in terms of melt extrusion and thermoforming. Many of the present polyolefin materials are manufactured by polymerization in the presence of a catalyst composition, and the catalyst composition may be part of the polyolefin. For example, the catalyst composition can be part of the polyolefin, which can be referred to as a "polyolefin catalyst composition." Many catalyst compositions are based on a metal complex, a cocatalyst, and an anionic activator, such as a Lewis acid. Due to the Lewis acidity of the anionic activator, the amount of activator included in the catalyst composition can be limited, which can have a detrimental effect on catalyst activity and/or operability. In addition, the amount of activator included in the catalyst composition can have an effect on the physical properties of the polyolefin. For example, the inclusion of Lewis acid-containing activators in the catalyst composition can cause undesirable discoloration of the polyolefin.Lindsay Lohan May Have Sold Her Hollywood House For $947K The actress has reportedly sold her Hollywood apartment for $947,000—but she might not be going anywhere any time soon.
