Cancers are characterized by uncontrolled cell proliferation. The genes responsible for cell cycle regulation have key roles in the development of cancer. For example, the Cyclin Ds and their associated kinases, Cyclin-dependent Kinase 4 and 6 (CDK4, 6) play a crucial role in the regulation of cell cycle checkpoints. During the cell cycle, cells move from one phase of the cycle to the next, driven by different cyclins and their associated kinases. In particular, Cyclin Ds form a complex with CDK4, which phosphorylates retinoblastoma protein (pRb). This results in the release of transcription factor E2F which can then initiate the transcription of downstream genes including the Cyclin E family. These are responsible for the switch from G1 to S phase. Aberrant Cyclin Ds activity is seen in many tumours, where it has been postulated that overexpression of Cyclin Ds is responsible for the uncontrolled cell cycle progression. CDK6 is also known to interact with Cyclin Ds to phosphorylate retinoblastoma protein (pRb). In addition, it was demonstrated that CDK6 activity is regulated by phosphorylation which occurs at a threonine residue in the C-terminal domain. Mutations in this threonine residue are seen in several different cancers, suggesting that this may have a role in the development of cancer. It has been shown that the Cyclin Ds and CDK4/6 play a crucial role in the development of cancer, specifically in the growth of leukaemia. One strategy for the design of anticancer drugs is therefore to target these proteins. There are several problems with this strategy. First, the activity of CDK4/6 is dependent on complexes with Cyclin Ds, and multiple Cyclin Ds can associate with a single CDK4/6. Many cancers therefore contain multiple isoforms of Cyclin D and CDK4/6. Second, although CDK4/6 is specifically required for the G1 to S transition, it cannot discriminate between Cyclin D
