Why are there two reaction times for smaller substrates in the kinetic experiments? {#s32} ----- electrophiles, glycine is also reactive with longer conjugated electrophiles formed from amino acids and peptides. We chose to use glycine as a model substrate for the following reasons: In the initial experiments with different thiols ([Figure 5] (#fig5){ref-type="fig"}), we used trithiobutyl-SG as a thiolating reagent. The maximum concentration of trithiobutyl-SG that can be used without introducing significant non-specific reactions with other thiols is 0.05 M, which is nearly 20-fold greater than the optimal concentration of EDC (0.002 M) that we have found previously in this laboratory. We used 1.5 equivalents of trithiobutyl-SG to synthesize the thiolated peptides and S-glutathionylate them using the three different thiols: cysteine, thioredoxin and glutathione. The concentrations of the primary amines required to obtain the formation of the electrophilic thioether conjugate are higher than the  $K^ \sim m^ \sim$  value of any of these amines for this reaction. To maximize the reaction rates for the three peptides 0cc13bf012
