Privacy policy: Ever since the re-release of Groundhog Day in cinemas two years ago, Danny DeVito has been missing from the television landscape. Sure, he could be found in the occasional series like Drop Dead Diva and a few guest appearances in The Office and 30 Rock, but there's no denying that he was sorely missing from our television screens. With all the enthusiasm that it received when it was first released, Groundhog Day deserved a sequel. It is one of my all-time favourite films, and with Bill Murray's performance being named by the American Film Institute as one of the top ten screen performances of all time, there was no way it would be left on the shelf. So what does this mean for the future? Well, I hope the sequel that was rumoured about is true and the two titans of comedy get together again, or if Murray hasn't signed up for another film, a spin-off is the logical conclusion. With Michael Eisner's production company Buena Vista International Productions now in charge of the franchise, one could hope that we'll see the return of Groundhog Day. As well as the film's director, Harold Ramis, we have a new star in Mr. Bill Murray, and if I was him, I'd try and get him to do as much for the franchise as he has done for all of the other films he's made in the past. Just like the intro to Anchorman said, "We haven't got time to make a sequel.
