here, we explore several uses for sensor networks as an extension to our standard geographic information system (gis). since the beginning of the 21st century, global positioning system (gps) technology has become a ubiquitous feature in modern life. with it, users can locate themselves in the world and navigate from point a to point b more accurately than ever before. the application programming interface (api) is a contract between a computer program and the operating system. the api specifies the functionality that a program requests from the computer. it's common to write and maintain a software program by referencing the functionality that the api provides. this service was created to supplement the tools, methods, and knowledge base that previously were available to help map the columbia river basin. it was intended to expedite the analysis of field data into a common format. for this device, this is a snap to install, just download the file and double click on it to run the installer. simply follow the wizard to complete the installation of arcgis runtime sdk for windows desktop. after the installation, copy the following folder to c:\program files\esri\arcgis. runtime. after the copy, arcgis will be automatically started on the desktop. after the desktop installation, you need to modify the system environment variables. the location of the arcgis runtime sdk for windows is shown in the figure below. now we can see that the arcgis runtime sdk is installed into "c:\program files\esri\arcgis. runtime\10.0\arcgisruntime\bin" but the arcgis application will look for the path "c:\program files\esri\arcgis.0\arcgisruntime\bin\arcgisruntime.dll" in order to load it. the location of the "c:\program files\esri\arcgis.dll" is shown in the figure below. 5ec8ef588b
